Editor's Note

There are a number of people I would like to thank and acknowledge for their contributions to making this special edition happen. First, as Catherine Hundleby mentions in her introduction, this volume has its genesis in a panel on argument and social justice at the 2019 European Conference on Argumentation (ECA) hosted by the University of Groningen. It was Catherine who proposed and organised that panel, so it is in part down to her vision and efforts towards that panel that we have been able to put this volume together. Thanks also to the organisers of the third ECA for their support for the panel. Thanks, of course, to those who have contributed work here and those who reviewed the papers. I am grateful to the journal editors who have been endlessly patient as we tried to write, review, and complete these papers through the constant changes and chaos caused by this global pandemic. David Forde has worked tirelessly to provide me with editorial assistance, and my job would have been a lot harder without him to share the load. David's position was funded by a research grant from the University of Waikato/Te Whare Wānanga o Waikato. I owe a further debt of gratitude to Catherine for agreeing to write the introduction to the volume connecting it to her and Phyllis Rooney's 2010 volume, Reasoning for Change. She and Phyllis have also provided invaluable guidance along the way. My intention was that this volume would, to some extent, reflect and expand upon the work that appeared in that volume. I hope we have managed to do that volume justice and to lay something of a foundation for future work in this area.
