Updraft

Carol Barrett

Outside Mother's Café, a man in waders and hoodie blows leaves from the patio, jetpack strapped to his back like an astronaut's gear. Any moment he could rise with loose billows of aspen into the bloom of clouds.

I sip my out-of-season berry smoothie, wondering what heights might be imagined for ordinary leaves.

Near the window, two women perch on high stools, one in dreadlocks and brown leggings, the other's coif ribboned with grosgrain. They are trading stories, sympathy mulching the tendrils of words. Outside our guardian gardener stoops to untangle bits of crinkled paper from the rounded clumps of grasses and prickly pines, hitches a wide shovel to his shoulder and departs. Thus we make our small order of things, our breakfast of what has been and what may be, eyes on the sky, its wind-stoked summons, its dogged waywardness.

Breathing with Boulders

Carol Barrett

Skies undulate with the landscape here – plains curving like blown glass while tumbleweed skip the road, bump along like gyroscopes catching in the sage. Patches of snow still cling to earth where rocks shelter them from the afternoon sun. Ahead, three horsemen, and dogs guiding cattle down the gulch.

I slow, then slow again, keeping pace with the land where I have come to let the losses of the last year roll out, their shadows lending a cautious look back. Already in the rear-view mirror the clouds have turned steel blue. Now the cows wend across my path, despite running dogs barking commands.

I slow, and slow. One chocolate cow meanders in front of the car, stops.

I nod. I wait, the revenant gap between this one and a swaying comrade growing. I allow the space she has signaled, grace seeping into my braked body like a damp rain on the prairie.

I breathe with the boulders.

Finally, she resumes her journey, deliberate as the wind on Highway 31.

Another follows. Another. I watch the whole lumbering parade.

Such are the guides I am given, timing exquisite as lichen tracing patterns in the rock.
